Western journalists were prevented from entering the game for two players a conference of the energy industry in Azerbaijan, in the past month and awakened concerns about the repression of the state before the crucial climate negotiations in the UN.

At least three journalists from the United Kingdom and France told the Guardian that they felt "insecure" after being prevented from entering the Baku Energy Week forum, despite the organizers having registered them weeks in advance.

The journalists said that they were not given a valid reason for being rejected, but they chose to leave the venue after a "frightening" and "intimidating" encounter with the organizers.

The conference was held just before Human Rights Watch revealed at least 25 cases of imprisonment or sentences of journalists and activists in Azerbaijan during the past year, almost all of which remain in custody.

Activists and civil society groups raised concerns that the defense of the climate is being stifled before the climate negotiations Cop29, held in Baku at the end of this year.

Lawrence Walker and Christopher Eales, both investigative journalists from Montel News, an energy news outlet, stayed away from the Baku Energy Week game for two players mid-month.

Another British journalist, who wrote critically about the Azerbaijan government in the past and asked not to be identified, also denied access to the event despite receiving accreditation weeks in advance.

The journalists left the venue after hearing an organizer say "leave them" to two Russian players while they were on the phone. They said they believed that this was a call for the team to leave the venue for security, he told Reuters on Sunday (26).

"When you are in a game for two players in a country without freedom of the press, where local journalists are imprisoned, you are not playing", said Eales.

A spokesperson for the event organizer Caspian Event Organisers said that a "misunderstanding" meant that the journalists were accredited for the exhibition, but not for the forum.

The journalists' e-mail correspondence, seen by the Guardian and the New York Times, asked for access to both events that were held in different local venues in the capital Baku.

The spokesperson added that the journalists were later prevented from the exhibition after organizers of the event told staff at the venue to "look for these reporters and prevent their entry into the exhibition".

The organizer said they felt "insulted" by the fact that they had to spend so much "energy" on two players three foreign journalists who insisted on staying at the conference, said the spokesperson. He admitted that the response was not "very professional", and apologized for the type of event:

The accreditation for the media for Cop29 will be carried out through the secretariat of the United Nations climate change, and the reporters in the game for two players may potentially register online. The organizers did not respond to a request for comment />

The Baku Energy Week was opened by the president of Azerbaijan, Ilham Aliyev; followed by a forum sponsored by BP and TotalEnergies of France.

Richard Sverrisson, editor-in-chief of Montel News, said that it is "deeply worrying" for the freedom of the press and the upcoming Cop29 talks about journalists being "intimidated or obstructed by simply doing their job".

"I am relieved that they have returned home safely. I only hope that other journalists are not treated in this way again by simply trying to report on a conferência internacional para a qual tiveram acreditação", acrescentou Sverrisson, acrescentando:

Mai Rosner, ativista sênior do grupo de defesa climática Global Witness disse: "A imprensa livre e a sociedade civil são fundamentais na luta contra o colapso climático. O Azerbaijão está tentando silenciar ambos - demonstrado mais dramaticamente pela surra ou prisão da Gubad Ibadoghlu ; um proeminente crítico das indústrias dos combustíveis fósseis Azeri. O governo do Azerbaijão foi abordado para comentar.
