A amateur detective described how he discovered a treasure of the bronze age, including a rare sword after he lost it during the meeting of the hunters.

John Belgrave, 60 years old, separated from the main group of detectors and went to a higher ground to try to identify them when he made the discovery of his life.

His device was activated while he was walking and when he unscathed, he discovered a sword rapier that dates back to the average age of bronze.

The rapier, 61 centimeters (2 feet) long, had been deliberately broken into three pieces and placed on the ground next to the mortal remains of the rich owner.

Exceptionally, the hilt was shaped to imitate a wooden handle. Only two rapiers similar to this one were found in Great Britain before and they were incomplete.

Like the rapier, a battle-axe head and a decorative bracelet were also found.

The Dorset Museum and Art Gallery spent 17,000 to buy the objects, with the cost shared between Belgrave and the owner.

Belgrave, a retired consultant from Purley Surrey, made the discovery in the village of Stalbridge near Sherborne in Dorset.

He paid 20 to go to the private agricultural lands, but he separated from the group.

Belgrave said: "There was a group of 40-50 detectors there and they had researched the land before, but they were excited because some new lands were opened for the hunt.

"I marked the land and I didn't know anyone there. In some way, I ended up lost... I then walked to a high ground, a field that was when I received a strong signal of life for this discovery."

"It was clear that there was metal there, but I thought it was an old tin can or something like that. I dug about eight shovelfuls down and I found a strange object made of clay balls."

"I didn't know what it was in the era, but it ended up being a solid hilt of a sword.

He then found the two broken sections of the blade, together with the head of the battle-axe and the bracelet.

Belgrave said: "I didn't know when I saw the head of the battle-axe that it was a treasure of the bronze age. My mind was that it was a rotation, but still the blade was sharp and with a view for the British it must have been deliberately broken on the ground for ritual reasons."

Elizabeth Selby, director of collections at the Dorset Museum said: "This treasure is incredibly special. The sword rapier is really unusual because of the bronze handle and the decoration. The bracelet was quite common too."

"There is really no other object comparable to the rapier, so being able to acquire these items is very important for us."

"Encounters like this one tell us about the way of traveling, knowing and exchanging ideas with other people in the continent during the centuries before the Roman invasion."

"There was a farming community there and these people generated enough wealth to be able to trade or exchange objects that others had made."
